the 1990s, the number of people in the UK who are aged 65 and over has increased by 1.5 million (1990–2000) and is projected to increase by a further 1.5 million by 2020 (Office for National Statistics 2001).

There is a growing awareness of the need to address the health care needs of the ageing population. The Department of Health (2000) has set out a vision for the future of health care for older people, and the National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE) (2001) has published guidance on the management of common health problems in older people. The Department of Health (2000) also published a strategy for the care of older people, which sets out a range of measures to improve the health and care of older people, including the need to improve the training and skills of health care professionals working with older people.

One of the key measures identified in the Department of Health (2000) strategy is the need to improve the training and skills of health care professionals working with older people. This includes the need to ensure that health care professionals have the knowledge and skills to meet the needs of older people, and to ensure that they are able to work in a way that is respectful of the dignity and autonomy of older people. The Department of Health (2000) also identified the need to improve the training and skills of health care professionals in the area of end-of-life care, and to ensure that they are able to provide a high quality of care for older people who are dying.

The Department of Health (2000) also identified the need to improve the training and skills of health care professionals in the area of mental health care, and to ensure that they are able to provide a high quality of care for older people who have mental health problems. The Department of Health (2000) also identified the need to improve the training and skills of health care professionals in the area of physical health care, and to ensure that they are able to provide a high quality of care for older people who have physical health problems.

The Department of Health (2000) also identified the need to improve the training and skills of health care professionals in the area of social care, and to ensure that they are able to provide a high quality of care for older people who need social care. The Department of Health (2000) also identified the need to improve the training and skills of health care professionals in the area of community care, and to ensure that they are able to provide a high quality of care for older people who live in the community.

The Department of Health (2000) also identified the need to improve the training and skills of health care professionals in the area of research, and to ensure that they are able to contribute to the development of new knowledge and skills in the care of older people. The Department of Health (2000) also identified the need to improve the training and skills of health care professionals in the area of education, and to ensure that they are able to provide a high quality of care for older people who are in education.

The Department of Health (2000) also identified the need to improve the training and skills of health care professionals in the area of practice, and to ensure that they are able to provide a high quality of care for older people who are in practice. The Department of Health (2000) also identified the need to improve the training and skills of health care professionals in the area of research, and to ensure that they are able to contribute to the development of new knowledge and skills in the care of older people.
